

Cherry Trees at the Ballpark for Nationals

Written by The Staff

Tuesday, 13 March 2007 11:45

---

If a cherry tree falls at the ballpark and no one was around to hear it, did it really fall?

Washington, DC has been known for its cherry trees, and starting in 2008, the Washington Nationals will add to that flavoring. That's because the club plans on planting George Washington's favorite target in their new ballpark. As reported by the AP :

“We couldn't find another ballpark that had trees in the ballpark,” team president Stan Kasten said Tuesday at the launch of a campaign to sell luxury suites.

As to whether the targeted 2008 opening day for the new facility being open is in jeopardy, “There's no question it's going to open on time,” Kasten said.