Mid-Atlantic Sports Network (MASN) announced today that they will add “Super Slo Mo” video replays to its production of home games, starting with Tuesday’s Beltway Battle at Camden Yards. While standard video cameras shoot about 24 frames per second, the “Super Slo Mo” camera shoots up to 90 frames per second, allowing at-home viewers to see incredible in-game detail.

The technology is currently being used by many national networks, but very few regional networks like MASN.

“This technology will allow viewers to see the actual stitches on the baseball as it approaches the plate. It marks another example of MASN’s commitment to providing the highest-quality coverage of major league baseball to its viewers,” said MASN spokesman Todd Webster.

The cameras will be used at Camden Yards and RFK Stadium during home games for both teams.
